Prenatal detection of a hyperdiploidy in a family with a balanced translocation. A family with a chromosome anomaly involving chromosome 15 and 22 was studied cytogenetically and karyotypically. Cytogenetic analysis of the family members showed a balanced reciprocal translocation between chromosomes 15 and 22 in the father, which is a result of a de novo event. In addition to the normal karyotype, the mother was found to have a triploidy, which most likely resulted from a chromosome anomaly. The fetus was found to have a hyperdiploid (53,XXY) karyotype by routine cytogenetic studies and a fluorescent in situ hybridization (FISH) analysis was carried out for confirmation of the hyperdiploidy. This case demonstrates the benefit of a careful prenatal diagnosis and karyotyping of the fetus to guide the appropriate delivery and management of the pregnancy. Murrindal, South Australia __NOTOC__ Murrindal is a locality in the Australian state of South Australia located in the state's south-east about south-east of the state capital of Adelaide and about east of the municipal seat of Barossa Valley. Its boundaries were created on 27 October 2003 and is named after the town of Murrindal in Queensland. The principal land use within Murrindal is agriculture, with a number of vineyards located in the south-western part of the locality.
