[Effects of endothelin on isolated rabbit single atrium]. Electrically-stimulated contraction of isolated rabbit single atria was suppressed by the endothelin (ET) in a concentration-dependent manner.

The ET-induced inhibition of contraction was observed after stimulation at 12.5 ms and 500 ms of constant length and no evident difference was observed between the two stimulations. The inhibition was suppressed by the sarafotoxin S6B, a selective ET-B receptor agonist, but not by the thiorphan, a selective ET-A receptor antagonist. The inhibition did not appear on pretreatment with pertussis toxin. The ET-induced contraction was inhibited without any changes in the resting potential of the atrium. In Ca^{2+} -free solution, the inhibitory action of ET was augmented significantly. The inhibition was suppressed by the addition of ruthenium red, a ryanodine-inhibitable Ca^{2+} channel blocker. These results suggested that ET, through a mechanism not involving the adenylate cyclase pathway, might inhibit the excitation-contraction coupling of the heart muscle by reducing the mobilization of intracellular Ca^{2+} from the sarcoplasmic reticulum.
